Semester: I
Syllabus with effect from June-2019

Objectives of the course:-

Every man in his day to day life from dawn to dusk makes a variety of contracts. Man's contract making activities increase with the increasing trade, commerce and industry. In a way living in a modern society would be impossible if the law did not recognize this contract making power of a person. This prompted Roscoe Pound to make his celebrated observation: "Wealth, in a commercial age, is made up largely of promises". In this sense India is also a "promissory" society. The conferment and protection by the law of this contract making power of persons gives them a considerable leeway to strike best bargain for the contract making persons. In a way they are permitted to regulate and define their relations in a best possible manner they chose. However, the contours of contractual relations in a feudal, colonial and capitalist society of pre-independence India cannot necessarily be the same in an independent and developing Indian society. Whatever may be the nature of a given society, the contractual relations, as are obtained in that society, are governed by certain principles which are more or less of a general and basic nature. In India these general principles are statutes in the form of the Indian Contract Act 1972.

Objectives of the course:

The Indian Penal Code in its basic structure is a document that consists of the list of all the punishments and cases that a person who commits any kind of a crime is to be held liable and charged with. It covers any Indian citizen or a person of Indian origin. The exception to this document is that any kind of military or armed forces crimes cannot be charged on the basis of Indian Penal Code. They have a different dedicated list of laws and the Indian Penal Code cannot supersede any part of it. The curriculum outlined here attempts to bring in these new perspectives.
